

Coley writes second book on educational leadership

In a follow-up to his popular book The Helmsman, Kenneth Coley, professor of Christian education administration and director of Ed.D. studies, has written a new book titled Navigating the Storms: Leading Christian Schools with Character and Conviction.

Coley continues the nautical analogy that he traced throughout The Helmsman in this book as well, with each chapter speaking to a significant issue that ministries in general, and Christian ministries in particular, deal with regularly.

“The landscape of ministry issues and leadership concerns is no longer considered static and predictable,” Coley said. “That’s why the nautical analogy works: the forces of swirling winds and rough currents are never the same two days in a row. Ministries require a skilled helmsman who has the vision and destination in mind but the techniques to respond to changes as they occur.”

Coley brings Scriptural insight to bear on real-world problems, along with insight from current leadership and management literature. The text is punctuated with examples and illustrations from Coley’s more than 30 years of educational leadership experience.

Navigating the Storms is published by Purposeful Design Publications, and is now available in bookstores and online.
